The Coming Transformation of Urban America

a presentation by

DAVID PEARCE SNYDER
Consulting Futurist

A dinner meeting of the World Future Society, National Capitol Region Chapter
January 15, 2009, 6 – 9 pm at Embassy Suites Hotel, Friendship Heights, Wash., DC

As we travel through life – out of the past, through the present and into the future – the pace of tangible change is typically so incremental that there seems to be little evidence to distinguish the future from the recent past. While the slow arrival of apparent change frustrates many futurists, attitude surveys suggest that the general public is much more comfortable with evolutionary change than with revolutionary change. But futurist David Pearce Snyder believes that the gradual pace of tangible, visible change in daily life is about to quicken, especially in urban America.

In his January 15, 2009, presentation for the WFS Washington Chapter, David will present an “instant pre-play”[®] of the coming decade, describing how an historic alignment of long-term demographic trends with the singular economic and political developments of 2008 will dramatically accelerate the “greening” of urban America; by ending suburban sprawl and promoting high-density infill development in conjunction with an explosive expansion of mass transit and the rapid adoption of “car-free” life styles. The “New Urban Metatrend,” concludes Snyder, means that we are now entering a future that will quickly become dramatically different from the recent past.

David Pearce Snyder has been in the forecasting business for over 30 years, during which he has built an impressive track record with his private and public sector clientele, while compiling a multi-million item data base of trends and projections. Snyder uses this data base to create detailed scenarios — “instant pre-plays” — of the most probable combinations of economic, technologic and social realities that specific industries, institutions, or individual communities or nations are likely to encounter during the next 5 to 15 years..
